

1099 Season is Here: What Employers Need to Know

It's the start of a new year, which means it's time to get your 1099s in order. If you paid any contractors in 2025, paid office rent, or received royalties, there's a good chance you've got some forms to file. The rules aren't complicated once you break them down - but waiting too long can lead to mistakes, missed deadlines, and penalties. So let's walk through the basics of who gets a 1099, which forms to use, and what deadlines you need to meet.

Who gets a 1099, and which form?

There are more than a dozen types of 1099s, but most small businesses deal with just a few. The most common are the 1099-NEC for nonemployee compensation, the 1099-MISC for rent and other miscellaneous payments, and the 1099-K for payments processed through third-party networks.

While the deadline for issuing most 1099s is usually January 31st, that date falls on a weekend, so the deadline has been pushed back to February 2, 2026.

1099-NEC: nonemployee compensation

You'll likely need to issue a 1099-NEC if your business paid $600 or more to a nonemployee, like a freelancer, consultant, contractor, or service provider.

This form applies when:

- The service provider is not your employee,
- The payment was made in exchange for services, and
- The payee is an individual, sole proprietorship, or partnership. If you're unsure how they're taxed, check their W-9 to confirm.

You typically don't issue a 1099-NEC to C or S corporations, but there are some exceptions. For example, if your business paid an attorney or law firm for legal services, you may still need to issue a 1099-NEC, even if they're incorporated.

LLCs can also be tricky. If the contractor's LLC is taxed as a sole proprietorship or partnership and they meet the $600 threshold, you must issue a Form 1099-NEC. If they're taxed as a corporation, you typically do not, unless a rare exception applies.

1099-NEC forms must be delivered to both the recipients and the IRS by February 2, 2026.

1099-MISC: miscellaneous income

You'll use Form 1099-MISC to report certain business payments that don't fall under nonemployee compensation. This typically includes rent payments of $600 or more for office space or equipment leases, royalty payments of $10 or more, and prizes or awards.

Just like with the 1099-NEC, you usually don't need to issue a 1099-MISC to a C or S corporation, but there are important exceptions. One of the most common exceptions is for business-related medical or healthcare payments. For example, if you paid for employee drug testing or occupational health visits, that will probably require a 1099-MISC.

You'll need to provide recipients with their 1099-MISC by February 2, 2026. However, there are different deadlines for filing with the IRS. For paper filing, the deadline is March 2nd; for electronic filing, it's March 31st.

1099-K: Third-party payment processors

If you pay a vendor through a third-party platform such as PayPal, Venmo Business, Square, or a credit card, you generally do not issue a Form 1099 for those payments. Instead, the payment processor is responsible for issuing Form 1099-K.

This avoids double-reporting the same income. Make sure your bookkeeping distinguishes between payments made directly to a vendor and payments made through third-party payment processors so you don't issue duplicate forms by mistake.

Tips for a smoother 1099 season

A successful 1099 season starts with good recordkeeping.

First, make sure you have a current W-9 for every vendor or contractor you've paid in 2025. Pay close attention to how LLCs are taxed on their W-9, because you may not need to issue 1099s for those taxed as corporations.

Second, ensure your vendor records are up-to-date. Confirm business names, mailing addresses, and taxpayer identification numbers. A quick check now can prevent notices and complications later.

Finally, it helps stay organized. Create a checklist of which vendors need 1099s and for which types of payments. This may even help you get a head start on the 2026 tax year.

Next Step

IRS penalties for late or incorrect 1099s can add up quickly, ranging from $60 to $330 per form, depending on how late they are filed.

Avoid the scramble by reviewing your records now, confirming who needs a form, and getting everything in order before February 2, 2026.
